Self | others
| society

Socio-ecological Perspective

The socio-ecological perspective considers social and environmental factors that affect health and wellbeing.

This concept allows people to look beyond the superficial and beyond themselves, looking at a much broader picture.

There are three different levels, Personal, Interpersonal and Societal.

Self | others | society

Personal

Comes from within an individual

Examples could be

personal attitudes, values, beliefs and behaviours, experiences, age, genetics

Interpersonal

Comes from direct interaction between people

Examples could be

whānau, friends, peers, classmates, teachers, relationships, school, sport, church

Societal

Comes from the wider community or society

Examples could be government, local council, media, culture, economy, advertising, industry, law, stereotyping, environmental, resource allocation, trends

Learning task

Sort these into Self- Others- Society factors that might influence someone to engage in a PE lesson

Confidence in physical ability – Fear of failure or embarrassment can reduce participation.

Media messages about fitness – Narrow ideas of what “being fit” looks like can alienate students.

Peer support or pressure – Friends participating increases likelihood of joining in.

Fear of judgement from classmates – Social anxiety can reduce willingness to try.

Previous experiences in PE – Positive or negative memories shape willingness to engage.

Body image concerns – Worry about appearance when changing or being active.

Motivation levels – Whether a student values effort, fun, or improvement.

Perceived competence – “I’m not sporty” mindset limits involvement.

Health or injury status – Pain, fatigue, or medical conditions affect engagement.

Teacher-student relationships – Feeling respected and encouraged improves engagement.
School PE structure – Choice-based programmes vs traditional sport units affect buy-in.

Access to facilities and equipment – Quality environments enable or discourage participation.

Timetabling pressures – Academic workload can make PE feel less important.

School culture around achievement vs wellbeing – If movement is valued for hauora, engagement increases.

Whānau attitudes toward physical activity – Family values can prioritise (or not prioritise) movement.

Team dynamics – Inclusive vs overly competitive environments affect enjoyment.

Cultural expectations – Some students may feel certain activities don’t reflect their

Stereotypes in sport

stereotypes

Gender Stereotypes

Means having fixed ideas or views of what it means to be male or female in society

Some stereotypes examples might include:

Male	Female
Males that play sports are “jocks” “Boys dont cry” Guys prefer practical activities over creativity	Girls need protecting over being independent Women shouldnt be competitive or aggressive Females should take on caregiving and family roles

Stereotypes in sport

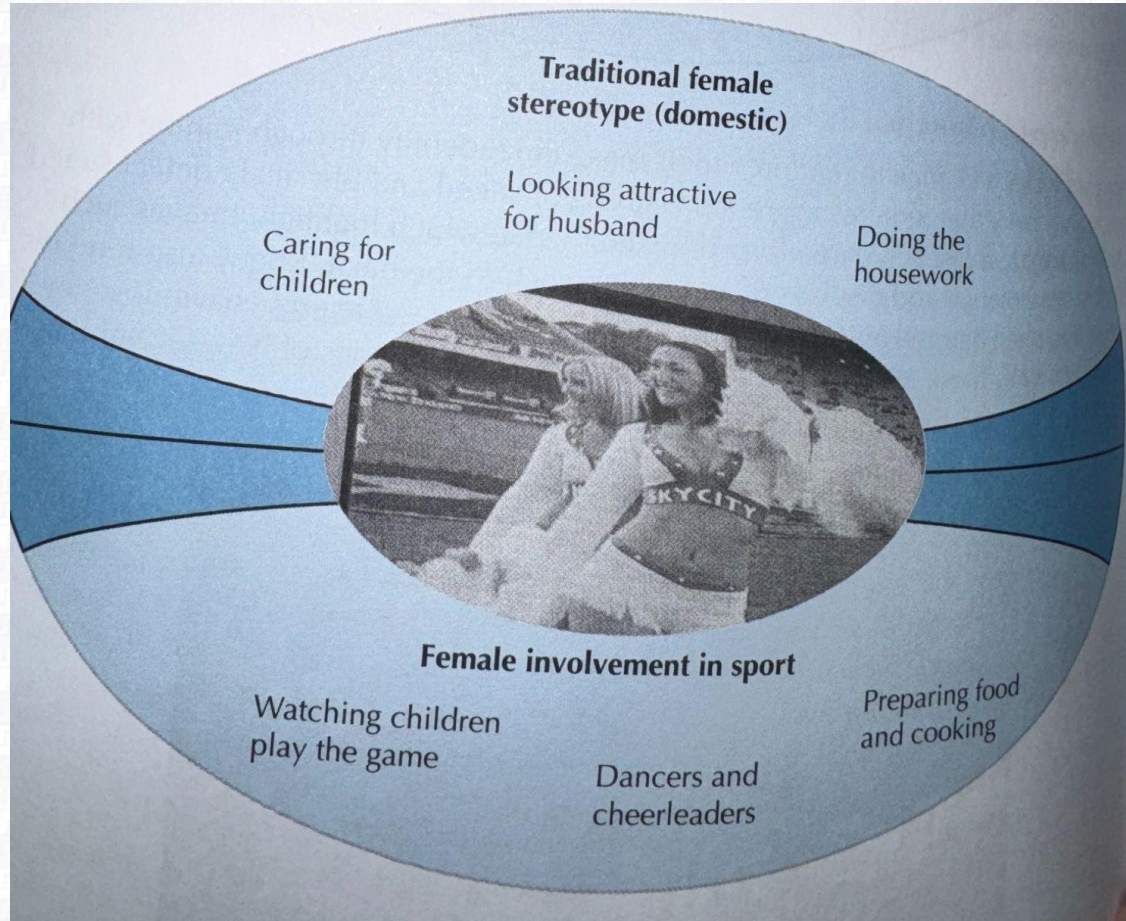

Gender roles

Describe the way society expects males and females to behave and the jobs they do in everyday life. There is a direct relationship between traditional gender roles and sport in NZ.

- Male sports are based on traditional masculine values such as physical strength and contest
- Women's involvement in sport can still be in the form of traditional roles such as being supportive and taking care of the food

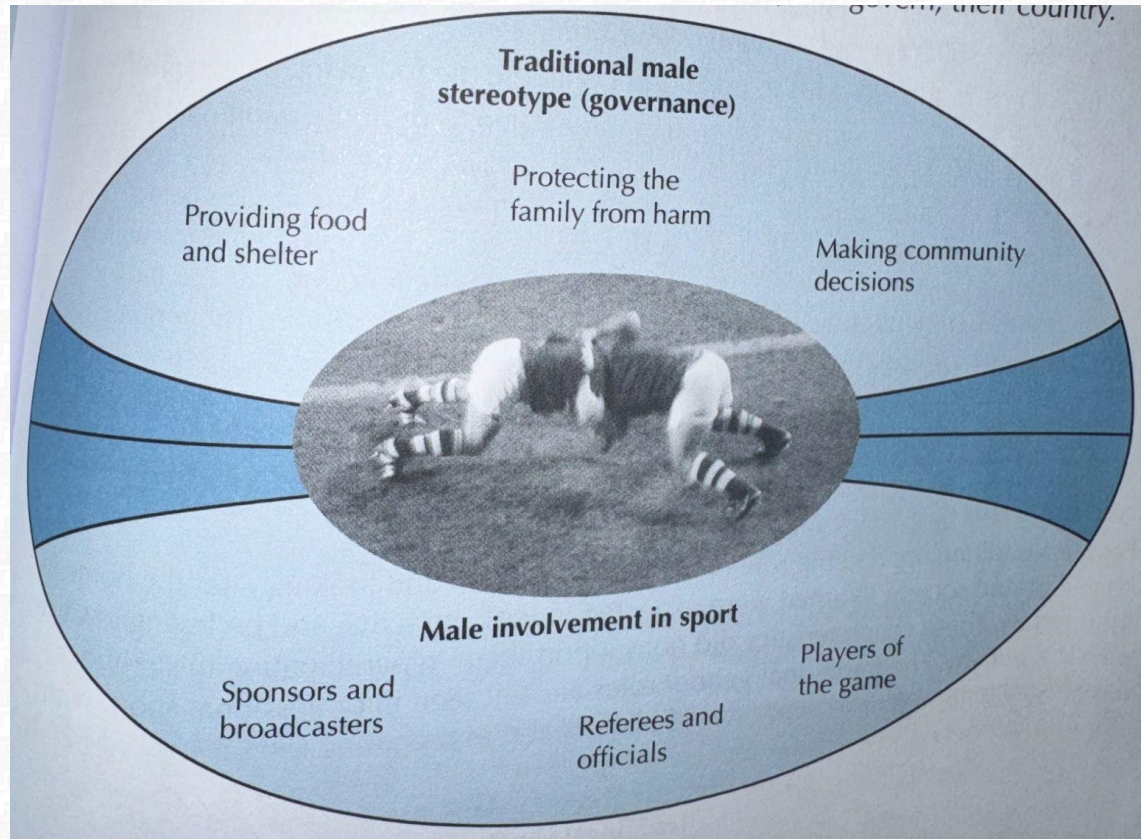

Eg professional rugby reinforces traditional male stereotypes - strength, aggression and decision making are needed to play the game

run club culture

What is run club culture?

Run club culture in New Zealand refers to the social and community environment built around organised group running. It includes everything from competitive athletics clubs affiliated with Athletics New Zealand to informal community groups and weekly events like Parkrun New Zealand.

Run clubs often promote fitness (taha tinana), mental wellbeing (taha hinengaro), and social connection (taha whānau), while also reflecting wider influences such as social media trends, body image ideals, and access to safe spaces. In NZ, run club culture can range from high-performance training environments to inclusive, social groups focused on participation and belonging.
